Progress of the Revolution.

We received yesterday by the Cherokee, files of Havana papers to the 2d inst. From the tone they observe editorially, touching the movements of the Patriots, the superficial observer might imagine that the Island was peaceably crowned, and that all commotion had been quelled by the strong arm of power. It is, however, a matter of absolute certainty that official journals cannot be depended upon. They tell us nothing but what emanates from Spanish authorities of the Island, who, in their duty before the people nothing calculated to excite apprehension or foment excitement. Accordingly we find in the papers before us a number of letters addressed by the officials of the various detachments sent against the Patriots—all of which seem little more than a recital of the same story—viz: that the troops are actively engaged in pursuit of the rebels; but the number of the latter is exceedingly insignificant; that they are cowards at every thing save the gleam of a Spanish sword, and that there is no doubt the insurrection will be speedily overtaken and routed in a few days, in the upshot of the information derived from the most diligent perusal of Havana press. It is meagre and unsatisfactory to the last degree. It is evidently intended to create the impression that the movement is far from formidable, while the reiterated reports from the army, announcing the many captures, is the pursuit of the Patriots, &c., belies the assumed tranquility of the affair. We, however, then, of all official intelligence we must necessarily rely upon the communications of correspondents. It is of course useless for us to say how much authority can be attached to their outgivings; but we have the experience of the journals for the last month that they may be depended upon. We refer to the Delta, which, if only [illegible] backwards
