Clyde and in other ship yards. These vessels are intended not only for England, but for various other countries, while new orders continue to pour. This is, says the Balti more discrizion, an important movement, and would seem to indicate an entire revolution in ship-building. Iron propellers, the motive power of which is steam are far less expensive in the consumption of coal than paddle-baxes, and are rapidly linking the place of sating vessels in the trabsmission of freight. The navigation of the coal by steamers is toxes, and are rapidly taking the piace or sating vesses in the trahemission of freight. The navigation of the ocean by steamers is not longer an experiment. The Atlantic is ditted with vessels of this class and character. The merchants and ship-builders of the world, aware of the fact, are givening themselves accordingly. In proof of this, it staged that in the port of New York, at the present time, there are numerous noble
