THE FRENCH NATION

The announcement of the sanction given by the Senate of France to the despotism of Louis Napoleon has announced in the United States a new kind of universal republican. The French nation has been treated by the Senate of that country with a severity that, at the present moment, need appear undeserved. The people became their own liberticides. They invoked the foundation of the modern Cæsarism. A once celebrated writer, the most timid and determined will of American society, that the time had reached the hideous necessity in the opposition that no inherent right of spirit and momentary evils in the character of the French people, and that at last to attempt reformation must be abandoned in the case of the candid and impartial to whom they which France has imposed on the neighborhood of Russia. The restoration of the ascendancy of the Citizen King improves some respects the state of France, but as all constitutive epochs they did not advance the nation a single step. The question liberty, there was hardly a trace. Arbitrary rule was still sustained under terms of respect for established forms. The revolution of 1848 and its consequences now before us, and it needs no argument to prove that France has gained nothing from. She has changed the name of Monarchy for that of Republic. In every essential respect it is the same as even to have retrograded to the worst periods in the dynasty of Bourbons.

It is then wonderful that a nation which, for a succession of years, has witnessed nothing but an alternation of despotism which, not wanted in all that name a single solid fact, elderly from its matters, and in fact that it should behold in these struggles no serious little more than a contest for government, interest and potentates, that it should be a languid interest in the result should exhibit as an amusing game ratification of which it is most unconcerned as to the result. For anarchy a century the people have been made the dupes of intrigue, and perfidy. Every new revolution has been accomplished amidst the battle-cry of liberty—every change has been nominal, no less of improvement, intellectual, physical or moral, has come need. And yet, from these, the people have not learned the political axiom that liberty is always bound intrinsically before the eyes of the world in market once by misery and evil. It is still the French people, ardent in the love of sensational excitement and enormous, hopeless of sustaining constant of fundamental political principles, and consequently, from the want of them, the victims of every adventurer who knows how to flatter their passions and mislead their judgments.

What is the result to be lastly, not to point out their recent deplorable activity. Were they to-day matter for all the appreciation to understand the value of true working freedom and the blessings of genuine representative and republican government they would prefer to be no republic to supposing chance at the first new competition to it.
