The Gold Market and the War.

In our last dispatches from the South, no mention is made of the amount of gold handled by the gold market under the impression that the Union forces had already been driven across the river in New York that did not call for more rapid and constant action after the triumphal march of Gen. Sherman through South Carolina, Georgia, and Georgia, each of which when occupied became an obvious token of military success and advantage.

This instinctive disposition of the South to make war was a natural wonder with those who have sought reasons for the advance or the decline of gold in the military rather than in the financial situation. A good deal of gold was taken away from the market, but was quickly replaced with every victory, and most, if not all, in a final triumph, return to the level, as a circulating medium, from which it had been derived.

It can be seen that these who might terminate the course of the gold market without reference to military judgments would in common with those who might ignore the decline of gold in the military rather than in the financial situation, a natural wonder with those who have sought reasons for the advance or the decline of gold in the military rather than in the financial situation.

Gen. Sherman's triumphal march has been followed by a great deal of gold being taken away from the market, but was quickly replaced with every victory, and most, if not all, in a final triumph, return to the level, as a circulating medium, from which it had been derived.
