A NEW CHARGE AGAINST MR. CLAY.

The Richmond Enquirer of the 20th ult. says of Mr. Clay, "we now find "him seeking the advice of physicians, "to excuse a visit to Kentucky, which "he did not openly venture to make." This sentence is in the true spirit of opposition. Why should Mr. Clay desire to excuse a visit to Kentucky? Has he been out lawed? his property confiscated—his relatives banished? Where can the editor find excuse for so pitiful a charge? In his own bosom? Would he seek advice of physicians to excuse a visit to the springs, or to an agency in a distant state? Such low cunning may be worthy of the editor. But the withering influence of our Dusha and Burrs and Browns has not yet so completely destroyed the chivalry of Kentucky as to make it necessary for Mr. Clay to stoop to so contemptible an artifice. The time has not yet come when he who has ever dared to serve his country, even at the sacrifice of health and fortune, shall not venture to come openly to the state of his residence, to visit those friends who have stood by him in many trials, and who, though stigmatized as cowards by Gen. Jackson, will not now abandon him. To make a jest of the dispensations of Providence, or to seek for political hypocrisy in the bodily afflictions of a distinguished citizen, is indeed loathsome; but it is too degrading a mode of warfare to be countenanced by a high-minded people.

OLD VIRGINIA.

Emigration.—About 486 Swiss emigrants arrived at New-York last week from Havre in the ships [illegible] IV, Caroline Augusta, and Henry. The applicants for passages were more numerous than could be accommodated by the American vessels. It is said that from one district of Switzerland [illegible] 6000 persons were making arrangements to embark for America.

Steam.—A London paper states that Messrs. Beale and Porter have accomplished that grand desideratum which has so long engrossed the attention of scientific men—the production and application of [illegible] pressure steam, by which they propose a most important economy in the bulk, weight, and consumption of fuel; while, at the same time, all possibility of explosion is prevented.

The value of the discovery is not confined to this important branch of the arts, the patentees having successfully applied their principle to various other operations requiring a regulated degree of heat; such as distilling, boiling and refining sugar, &c. to which and similar branches of manufacture it offers the means of applying, with unerring precision, exactly that degree of heat which is requisite, passing it beyond the chances of accident or negligence to exceed the proper degree, and consequently produce any injurious results. In the first named process, that of distillation, it will be hardly possible to produce a faulty sample of spirits, or to throw over any empyreumatic flavor, and the cumbrous and costly apparatus now used for agitating the contents of the still will be no longer necessary. In refining sugar, the advantage of the plan will be truly important, all possibility of burning the cane-juice being prevented, no molasses being produced, and consequently the production of [illegible] sugar will be [illegible] increased in quantity, as well as improved in quality; in particular that [illegible] of their shipments now lost by drainage from the casks during the voyage to Europe, will be saved by the planters.

The patentees have proved, it is said, by actual experiment, the advantages of their discoveries; but as they are applying for exclusive rights abroad, the London editors, though they have witnessed their operations, do not feel at liberty to lay before their readers the very simple and unexpensive means whereby all these benefits are gained.

An engineer in Bucks county, says an English paper, has discovered a mode of making wine from saw dust. He was struck with the sweet odour of the fresh saw-dust from Quebec fir timber. He adopted the usual mode of making other wines, forming an extract with the aid of moist sugar.—He put it by, in a stone jar, slightly corked, and it was forgotten for two years. On tasting it it proved very palatable, and a glass of brandy was put into each bottle when it was bottled off. It has a slight and rather pleasing taste of turpentine, and operates on some as a gentle diuretic, which induce a belief that it might be beneficial in gravelly complaints, at the same time that it is pleasant to drink. The cost of the liquor, [illegible] the sugar and brandy, is said to be about [illegible] of the retail price of ale.

Nearly three columns of the London Morning Chronicle of April 29, are occupied with the arrest of Wm. Corder, who had been committed for trial at the next Assizes in Suffolk county, and the coroner's inquest on the body of his victim, a young woman named Maria Martin, whom he murdered in May, 1827. The statements made before the coroner disclosed a disgraceful state of society in the town of Polsted, where the murder was committed. The deceased had left her father's house, dressed in male attire, in company with Corder, who said they were going to be married, and went to a large barn about half a mile distant, to change her dress where she was murdered and buried by Corder. He told her parents that she was residing at a distance and that preparations were making for the wedding. Some circumstances led to discovery, and eleven months after the murder, the body was found, not so much decayed as to prevent its being identified. The deceased had been seduced by a gentleman named Mathews, brother of the lady of the manor of Polsted, by whom she had two children, and afterwards had a child by the prisoner, which died suddenly and was buried at 12 o'clock at night by the prisoner. The reason of her dressing in male attire was that she might escape the parish officers who, it was said, were about to arrest her for having had illegitimate children who might become a burden to the parish; Corder said he would marry her to prevent this. The murderer was a young man of a respectable family, the only remaining child of his mother who had lost her husband, two sons and a daughter within the last two years. It seems that he has a wife, but it does not appear how long he has been married to her.

From a Liverpool paper.

Dreadful Explosion in a Coal Mine.—On March 27th, says a letter from Liege, at seven o'clock in the evening an explosion threw down a whole gallery in a coal mine, at Seraing, (Belgium.) Seventy-one miners were at work, thirty-nine of them were killed, eight others were suffocated, and twenty-four escaped, being in a part of the mine to which the explosion did not extend. The explosion was heard half a league from Seraing, and the flame from the mine rose through the air-shaft eight or ten feet. The suffocated people were found much swollen, but their bodies were entire. Notwithstanding the violence, the injury done to the mine is not so great as was apprehended. The air-shaft is injured towards the bottom, and the lower ladders are in a bad state. The iron carts used for transporting the coals from the distant parts of the mine have been flattened and bent in all manner of shapes. Two horses where killed, and so swollen that their collars were burst. The cause of the explosion is not known.

Dutch Morality.—Within the last fortnight an order of affiliation has been obtained, by the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, against the Duke of Dorset, to compel his Grace to give security to the parish for the maintenance of a child which a female has sworn he was the father of. An attempt was made to shake her evidence as to the identity of the individual; but it failed; and the Duke compounded the claim of the parish by paying 180*l*.

Paper.—It is related that the manuscript of Philemon Holland's translation of Pliny's Natural History, a large folio, was accomplished with a single pen. Dr. Warton wrote his Ecclesiastical History, 2 vols. folio, and Dissertation on the Rommage Prayer, a folio, with one and the same pen; both these pens were from goose quills and had been used before they commenced their great tasks. Zeno Catalino wrote Greek for forty years with one pen, (probably an iron one, stylus) and having lost it when it was scarcely worn, and still useful, he could scarcely refrain from weeping, so much was he attached to it. Some of our modern beaus and belles destroy half a dozen good quills before they can complete a single billet. It is apparent to every one, however, that a pen will write legibly, a long time after it is unfit for handsome writing; and we will venture to say that the printers of the works above referred to, would have preferred to furnish quills, gratis, to these prudent penmen.
