BIRDS SEEK THE WARMTH.

Trait of English Sparrows Recently Brought to Light.

Bird Lore gives an interesting account of a new way the English sparrows have found of keeping warm on cold nights. Many of the houses in a country community have been provided with lanterns in porches and entrances fitted with incandescent light bulbs.

As soon as lights appear, and even before, the birds take their places, one in each lantern. If the thermometer outside is down to 27 it may be 44 inside the lantern several hours after lighting.

"While it gives pleasure on a wintry night to think that the birds are enjoying the warmth of the electric lights, it is questionable whether the toasting at night followed by exposure to storm and wind by day be beneficial. And if this suddenly acquired habit of the English sparrow is injurious it is at variance with the commonly received idea that animal instincts are a safe guide.

"If the greater warmth is so agreeable to these birds why do they not go in winter to a warmer latitude? Are they unaware of the migration of other species, or are they physically unable to accomplish it? Or is it something so long absent from their hereditary make-up as to be non-existent to them?"

HAS LIFE OF LITTLE CARE.

Mexican Laborer an Invertebrate Enemy of Hard Work.

There is no more independent person in the world than the Mexican laborer, says an American who has capital invested in that country. Especially is this true of the peon of the tropics. It would seem that he works for Americans who have big plantations to develop more as a matter of accommodation than from necessity.

He demands a snug sum in advance, too, on which to have a good time at the "bestas" before he settles down to several months of drudgery. No native Indian has to work for white men in the tropics to gain livelihood. His wants are few, his ambitions are limited to a desire for enough to eat—a thatched-but-and-a-little cotton cloth. The hut he can make for himself. There are fish in the river and game in the forest.

There is plenty of unoccupied land upon which he can raise a few cereals to trade for the things he cannot produce himself. There is no winter to provide against, and though the rainy days come often in summer, they only mean more rest.

Peer Who Starts Women's Fashions.

Entomologist, sportsman, agriculturist and politician, Lord Walsingham, who recently celebrated his sixty-fourth birthday, is "several single gentlemen rolled into one," and has a variety of interests denied to the average man. His collection of moths and butterflies is the largest and most important in the world, and, by his generosity, is the property of the nation, to whom it was conveyed by deed of gift in 1901. A large part of it is in the Natural History museum at South Kensington, and it is a curious and little known fact that woman's fashions are directly indebted to Lord Walsingham and his collection. Dress-makers and designers of butterflies go to the drawers and cases of butterflies and moths to study new combinations and contrasts of color, subtle shades of nature and harmonies of tone, which are to be beheld and studied there, and there alone.

A Clever Rebuke.

A young man dwelling on the borderland of aristocracy, where, as George Eliot says, annexation becomes a burning question, was entertaining a group on a hotel piazza. With great freedom he swung into conversation by familiar abbreviations, the names that decorate society columns. At length a woman, gazing pensively out at sea from the depths of a shaker rocker, turned toward the young man and, bending over the arm, said: "My dear sir, you have buried a man who was alive on Friday. Such haste is not seemly. You have divorced a woman now happily wedded. This is premature. But when you marry my husband to another woman I must reproach you. My dear sir, you should respect the law if not the gospel!" Needless to add he was severely squelched.

Worshippers in Old St. Mark's.

"That old St. Mark's over there is an endowed church," he explained as they passed it. "It is self-supporting. Some Sunday come down here and see the people. It is the strangest mixture of people in New York. Of course, there are many who go to it here on the East Side, it being situated here, but you'd be amazed to see the wealthy old people who come down from Riverside Drive and West End to attend that church because their fathers and grandfathers did. It is wonderful, really."—New York Times.

Sold.

"Well," said the proprietor, "I see you have at last sold that ugly hat we expected to have on our hands."

"Yes," replied the saleslady, "I got a middle aged woman to try it on yesterday and then told her that it would not, of course, do for her because it was intended for a very young woman."

The Contraries of Speech.

"Cannot I help you at this trying time?" asked the cook's admirer. "No," replied the cook, "for this is my hour of knead." And she forthwith proceeded to work the dough.
