GOVERNOR DECLARES that he entered into [illegible] pledges to support WALKER's hostility to the democratic principles of America, to the establishing a Southern despotism as counterbalance to the United States; that receiving WALKER had no idea of promoting the annexation of Cuba, he paused and did not start instantly for England. The next step in WALKER'S policy was the revival of slavery in Nicaragua—a measure of preposterous stupidity in the opinion of GOICURIA. He then continues as follows:

I feel already argued with Mr. Walker. He received my suggestions with rudeness and coldness. I remonstrated again. He has replied by a gross and most unmerited insult. He has done all that in him lies to cover me with infamy. His course leaves me no option. I thought I had to do with a man of honor, and I was dealing with a man utterly regardless of the most sacred obligations.

As long as I believed that Mr. Walker was [illegible] of honor and honest and ordinary sagacity, I pulled myself steadily to his rudder; and [illegible] right he was true to the cause of Central America. I was his devoted friend. He had not rejected every claim to confidence and to a reputation for common sense. I would still adhere to him. I would hurl back [illegible] would make things worse. But [illegible] there was the shadow of a chance that he would keep his pledged word—if there was [illegible] ground to believe that he would adhere to the principles he professed.

Now—no reason or other, best known to himself, he chooses to violate and engage [illegible] me, and, too, informs me, in language [illegible] to be misunderstood, that he [illegible] of such neither with me nor with you. He openly avows principles directly [illegible] the growth and grandeur of this country. He cherishes sentiments, and has [illegible] openly charge, that I am treacherous and false—when they and he know that [illegible] have been pure and irreproach[illegible] and [illegible] whose is crowned by an outrageous insult.

As to Mr. Walker, pretending to put his breach with me on the ground of his having [illegible] my want of faith, it is a mere [illegible] and my well founded objections to [illegible] certain regards the Transit [illegible] and his revival of slavery and [illegible] trade. It is only a new instance of his want of [illegible] and of a bull headed obstinacy. Any sane man can see for himself who in these matters is right. When Mr. Walker's first necessity was to have a steady and regular communication with the United States, in order to receive men and munitions of war, and broke up the Transit line—now that he sees that the Panama road is [illegible] for the transport of troops, and [illegible] of England and France, he restores slavery and the slave trade. And this he expects I [illegible] nothing. Her gallant seamen for years have [illegible] the slave trade, and [illegible] pass current for ability and statesmanship.

I expect nothing, therefore, from him—can expect
