STEAM-BOATS.

Since our last, two more steam-boats, the Ontario and Velocipede, have been in our port. It was their first appearance among us this season: They promptly found full freights, and will doubtless return. Another boat, the St. John, is expected in a day or two. This will make six steam-boats in our trade with New-Orleans, and affords great facility in getting the last year's crop to market. Although we have had from twelve to fifteen sail of sea vessels carrying away our produce since November, there is still left such a quantity of sugar, molasses and cotton, as to create some doubt if all can be got to market in good time. This late addition to our steam-boats, promises to ensure a speedy carriage of the remaining stock to New-Orleans.

Our commerce has become so considerable of late, that Bayou Pigeon must be opened.—Until the waters get very high, steam boats are liable to be wrecked or delayed in lake Chicot.—A few thousand dollars judiciously applied, would ensure us a good communication for steam boats, with Plaquemine, the whole season, It can and must be done.—Gazette.

Private Correspondence.

The merchants of this place are very much alarmed since they have read in the Correo Mercantile of this morning the following notice.

"Canary Islands.—We have received from Orotava, that they have seen in the waters of that Island, a Buenos-Ayrean squadron, which being now at piece with Brazil, directs attention to the coast of Spain. This squadron consists of the corvette Vingt Cinq-Mai, of 32, 36 pounders, and with a crew of 150 men, a brig of 11 guns and 50 men, and of a schooner of 3 guns and 50 men. This squadron is commanded by Amiral Fournier, second in command in the Buenos Ayrean navy, and has already captured the Spanish ship Nérléide, coming from Rambla to Orotava.

From the National Journal.

We find the following paragraph in the Newark (N. J.) Eagle, of Friday last :—

"By recent advices from Washington, we learn that it is conceded, on all hands, at that place, that Mr. Van Buren's motive, in visiting Meridian Hill, was that of obtaining information and counsel which he was unable to acquire from any other source. Mr. Van Buren was not only desirous of being informed on the matter in question, but was anxious to cultivate a friendly relation with Mr. Adams, and thereby to lay the foundation for further intercourse, which he well knew could not but be the means of supplying him with much valuable and indispensable information and advice. It is said that Mr. Adam's department was perfectly dignified and gentlemanly; he entered very fully and frankly into the desired explanation, and communicated his ideas and counsel without reserve. Mr. Van Buren returned from his visit perfectly satisfied, having been given to understand by Mr. Adams that it would afford him pleasure to assist him in whatever might be useful to him in the management of his department."

Of the accuracy or inaccuracy of this statement we know nothing. If it be correct, we may be allowed to express our satisfaction that Mr. Van Buren has voluntarily sought an intercourse with Mr. Adams, notwithstanding the pernicious example set by General Jackson. We are still more gratified at the manner in which Mr. Adams is said to have received the Secretary, forgetful of his own wrongs and the personal injustice done to him, in the desire—an engrossing one in the bosom of every true patriot—to promote the public interest. There was no other source to which Mr. Van Buren could apply with any chance of success. The new President has had no experience, nor has he been educated in those studies which would supply him with the knowledge necessary to enable him to diffuse light among the members of the Cabinet. There is not an individual in the administration, nay we will go further, there is not one in the party, who could have given the information. To do the public business, therefore, understandingly and efficiently, Mr. Van Buren, it appears, was compelled to go to Mr. Adams instead of General Jackson, and there is nothing wonderful in this.

The New-York Enquirer was very solicitous to remove this visit from the ground of courtesy, and to make it one of business. Let the editor have the full benefit of this effort. The wheels of the government could not go along without aid from Mr. Adams. Mr. Van Buren was solicitous "to lay the foundation for further intercourse," in order that he might thus obtain "much valuable and indispensable information and advice.

While the Secretary of State thus admits the importance of a friendly intercourse with Mr. Adams, and derives such necessary information and "advice," from his proximity to the city, the organ of the Cabinet is daily lavishing abuse upon Mr. Adams for remaining in the vicinity of the city, attributing to him a motive foreign from his habits and disposition; by charging him with writing paragraphs to place the new administration in an odious light before the people. Were he disposed to make the administration unpopular, could he do it in any manner more effectively than by withholding from them such "indispensable information and advice" as Mr. Van Buren requires for the conduct of his department, and may require again and again! The real object of the Telegraph, and that part of the cabinet which dictates to it, is to prevent the people from seeing and understanding the fact that the administration are under the necessity of seeking the assistance of the very individual whom they have charged with incapacity and inefficiency, and the alledged abuses of whose administration they tell the people that they are about to reform.

BANKING.

It is believed that in a few years, the three banks of North Carolina will own the whole State. If they want to raise money, what is to hinder them from setting up the State of North Carolina at auction, and knocking it off to the Barings of London, for a good price? If so, they would say—"For sale to the highest bidder, the State of North Carolina, with all its appurtenances." &c. [Noah.

One of the blessings of Monarchy.—The Duke of Northumberland, the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, has an income of 260,000*l.* (nearly $1,200,000) per annum. And this man is sent to Ireland, poor, oppressed Ireland, to fatten on the poverty of the Irish peasants. What a contrast between the governor and the governed. [Middletown Sent.

Elizabeth Weaver, a resident of Canterbury, Connecticute, has attained the age of 103 years. She enjoys excellent health, and converses intelligently of "by gone days." The youngest of her children is said to be 80. Her recollections seem unimpaired, and when conversing of Pomfret, the place of her childhood, she appears quite animated.

Heroism of a Quaker.—In the American war, a New-York trader was chased by a French privateer, and having four guns and plenty of small arms, it was agreed to stand a brush with the enemy, rather than be taken prisoners. Among several other passengers was an athletic Quaker, who, though he withstood every solicitation to lend a hand, as being contrary to his religious tenets, kept walking backward and forward on the deck without any apparent fear, the enemy all the time pouring their shot. At length, the vessels having approached close to each other, a disposition to board was manifested by the French, which was very soon put in execution; and the Quaker being on the look-out, the first man that jumped on board he unexpectedly sprang toward, and grapping him forcibly by the collar, said, "Friend, thou hast no business here,"—at the same time hoisting him over the ship's side.
