SUMPTUARY LAWS.

The Maine Liquor Law, as it is styled, that is, which was passed by the Legislature of Maine, and published under special penalties the manufacture or sale of spirituous liquors as a beverage, has excited a great excitement among the people of the North. It is vehemently discussed by the politicians, journals and Rhode Island apostles and temperance supporters. In the State of New York, where pecuniary interests to an immense amount are involved in the production and consumption of liquors, the question is agitated with uncommon warmth in consequence at the introduction into the Legislature of a bill similar in character to that passed by the General Assembly of Maine. The strongest hostility to the proposed measure comes from the city. A call appears in the public prints, headed "Remonstrance to Oppression and Fanaticism," for a crowded mass meeting of all who are opposed to a project that ranks the signers will distranchise the free soil of the State, destroy their business and ruin their commercial and manufacturing interests. It is unnecessarily angry, and another appeal to the great State already 3,000,000 strong, will come to Albany, remonstrations against the passage of the act and that petitions are ready to send. Among those are those ready to send. Among those are those merchants of respectable standing, mechanics, manufacturers and physicians.

We do not see whether this demonstration has any weight with the Legislature of Albany, but we think that the petitioners are right in a principle. We have ever been the unbending advocates of sumptuary laws. They are the only effectual and yet the most inoffensive mode of extirpating the evils against which they are directed. It is in many matter to forbid, and to be desperate, but the effort almost always fails. The history of the Jewish people, the edicts of the Spanish Cortes, have been attended with the same result. Yet the moral and the instruments on the human body, which have been neglected for some years, have been properly remitted to London—thus improving the mode but not the object.

The President congratulates the Legislature on the discovery of mineral wealth in various parts of the country. Mines of gold, silver, copper and iron have been opened. Fortunate an inexhaustible source of riches and prosperity.

The United States sloop of war, the Cyane arrived at Gibraltar on the 10th of January.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.

Tyler has proffered the steamboat Society for service them to the Baltic, whose attention Sudetzki the opposite the Arsenal. Congress will probably adjourn over from Friday to Monday, in consequence of the [illegible] Washington's birthday. Preparations are being made by the Baltic Association for the reception of the officers of the steamboat Arctic, who are expected in the city on Saturday next.
