THE DAILY BEE.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 17.

...ORK Mail has arrived yesterday from ...

THE WALKER SNARE.

...ator Walker to the ...ered placidly enough ...ent no offense to the ...ther papers in the ...ntry of them as have ...xpress the opinion— ...ppointed the address in ...t course. Take, for in... Times—a journal of ...reputations among the ...and yet, without the ...wrath before its eyes, ...Gov. Walker's recom... inauguration in such language ...

...ld of detention to the ...be a Federal minion, ...t, was hope, will ...

...a reason for these ...ld threats by the Gover... ...the end of a ...struggle was restricted ...the Territory at a speci... ...was taken ...ecognition from the ...the suspicion of ...Walker, who, more ...the designs of the Con... ...the proposition of ...Constitution to a ...for ratification, is ...acting favor with this ...

...ent marvellously ...uncompromising ...strictures of the ...know the coldness ...politeness of the ...sharpness of the ...The latter spare ...the President; ...the power which ...

...the various recom... ...the inaugural look ...to the free soil ...address, with ...and the stubborn appeal ...the impress of a servile ...As for the leading ...converts, that after the ...on shall have con... ...committed to ...but the fact is that it was not aware that ...was making an experiment until the thing was done. Henceforward I shall record daily incidents which may serve to illustrate the case, and at an after period methodically treat it.

"This day the out-door laborers were engaged in storing ice for the ice house. The child sleeps on the floor, on a traveling rug folded in four, the room without fire or carpet, and is generally washed daily. There is a large bow window to the North. It is the coldest room in the house. He was put to bed at half-past ten. He is without any clothes or covering whatever. At one o'clock, being unable to sleep, I was so cold with three blankets that I had to put on a fur cloak. The child waxed up, and made vehement appeals to be taken in. I took him in. When I was going to sleep myself, I told him to go to bed. He moaned so bitterly that I apprehended that he feared the cold. To test him I got out of the bed and lay down on his rug, (without clothes) he then would not remain a moment in the warm bed, but followed me to his pallet. He composed himself to sleep, lying like a frog, and I left him. When he came into bed, I was obliged to put a blanket between us for the bitter cold of his limbs; but every way that I could arrange the clothes I felt no sign that he suffered from the cold or desired the fire.

"To correct the frightful fits of crying he used to have, and for another failing which I could of necessity to be put a stop to, I had to have recourse formerly to punishment by shaking him, slapping him, and dipping him in a trough of cold water. As he grew hardened under the action of cold and very severe shampooing, punishment by these processes became impossible.

"He has two meals—generally boiled rice —which is put on a napkin on the ground, and he picks it up to the last grain. After that, wheaten flour cake, with butter, and a cup of milk, which he drinks. While eating his rice he looks a different being, there is at once a pride and enjoyment of performance. He has the air of an orator addressing an audience.

"During the day he goes to sleep when he likes, merely lying down on the floor.

"It was remarked by a lady to chat, that he is not like a child, but a small man. A gentleman has just remarked that he never knew the meaning of 'man-child' until he had seen him.

"The attitude he assumes in sleeping is that of the Musulman making prostrations—in his knees, with the head placed out but before him, which could not be if he suffered from fatigue; but his muscles are too hard for that. He has passed the ordeal of teething, active, cheerful and intelligent; his appearance constantly reminds the observer of the best efforts of our best painters and sculptors. Therein is the beau ideal; he is the reality. His simple, natural, easy, graceful, and ever-varying postures, are charming. He arrests the attention and commands the admiration of all who see him. His peculiar character of his skin is very striking; it is exquisitely healthy and beautiful. It may be compared to the rays of the sun streaming through a pellucid window.

"During the progress of the experiment he has cut three teeth without manifesting any of the disagreeable symptoms usual to children in that condition. He appears to be quite sensible to pain. Occasionally he has an ugly fall, but not a sound escapes from his lips. His manners, demeanor, and general behavior are equally striking. His mode of saluting a person is to take the hand in a graceful manner and kiss it. He is under the complete control of his father, and is perfectly quiet during meals, and also when he is told to be so. He goes about all days, amusing and occupying himself in a quiet way. No one accustomed to children would know there was a child in the house. So incredible are these results that the skin is only equaled by the insensibility of the flesh. We have never known him since his exposure to extreme cold to suffer from pain. Last night the difference between a day passed in enjoyment and mine was brought home to me in a remarkable manner, by my suffering from the state of the surrounding atmosphere when he knew none, enlarging to an equal degree the pleasures derivable from atmospheric temperature. And this is only the commencement of the process. When he is two years old we will be able to enjoy life, as dependent upon the surrounding atmosphere, in the opposite extremes of zone, where life is supportable under ordinary circumstances only by means of clothing. That eternal question, "What will Mrs. Grundy say?"

We have received from a correspondent an extract from the journal kept by the father of the child:

"Dec. 27, 1856—I was about to begin with self-gratulation, that I have succeeded during its progress the steps of an experiment so novel, and in its consequences so important; but the fact is that I was not aware that I was making an experiment until the thing was done. Henceforward I shall record daily incidents which may serve to illustrate the case, and at an after period methodically treat it.

"This day the out-door laborers were engaged in storing ice for the ice house. The child sleeps on the floor, on a traveling rug folded in four, the room without fire or carpet, and is generally washed daily. There is a large bow window to the North. It is the coldest room in the house. He was put to bed at half-past ten. He is without any clothes or covering whatever. At one o'clock, being unable to sleep, I was so cold with three blankets that I had to put on a fur cloak. The child waxed up, and made vehement appeals to be taken in. I took him in. When I was going to sleep myself, I told him to go to bed. He moaned so bitterly that I apprehended that he feared the cold. To test him I got out of the bed and lay down on his rug, (without clothes;