NEW ORLEANS, TUESDAY NIGHT, April 4, 1843.

Since our last we have received advices from England up to the 3d inst., both of the ouraging nature in regard to cotton, the staple of which, however, has been to a considerable extent withdrawn from other markets to supply the demand of Great Britain. It is hardly to be imagined that the [illegible] could be so fed as was the case during the [illegible] Russia is in general [illegible] the [illegible] of her produce [illegible] which under favorable circumstances would annually be [illegible].

The weather has at last become somewhat more favorable although not of a character as yet to justify the [illegible] of the year. The season is decidedly backward. To say that [illegible] month and the very cold and disagreeable weather which has prevailed for some weeks past, must of necessity exercise a prejudicial influence on the crops. What [illegible] could not at such unfavorable [illegible] will be [illegible] to make up for the [illegible] of the season. Nothing is more [illegible] than the most favorable circumstances [illegible] within the range of probability, and at the present moment it is really some consolation to foresee that the next yield will probably show a considerable falling off. The character of the weather has been such as invariably to injure and retard cultivation, by which, even allowing a continuance of favorable weather hereafter, the time [illegible] the crop will necessarily be exposed to those numerous vicissitudes, which are far more likely to occur if the picking is delayed to a later period of the year.

We have already contended that the present depressed condition of our staple [illegible] a great measure to [illegible] production. Cotton has been produced in such prodigious quantities as to exceed even the most imaginative purposes of consumption and with the experience of the last season before us, we imagine, with every [illegible] a limited growth and higher prices, we will more than compensate for the next year's crop the present [illegible] value.

A sale has been [illegible] night (after closing our previous report) [illegible] mail arrived, bringing the steamer's advices from England up to the 4 h March. The tenor of [illegible] which we have already alluded, [illegible] to [illegible] day, the Liverpool cotton market having [illegible] during the week preceding the steamer's departure whilst prices had further [illegible] 1-16 on our week market these opposing [illegible] no effect whatever, the sales on Saturday were [illegible] 4,000, [illegible] 3,000, together, 15,000 bales, and [illegible] throughout has exhibited great firmness, also [illegible] quotations.
