touches of almost all the creations of the reign of Queen Anne, this work is a singular code of deprayity, interpreted by sharpers and wantons. It became the object of the clergy's special animadversions; and while the preacher fulmined, from the pulpit against its immoral tendency, its uninterrupted success on the boards proved that genius will triumph in despite of opposition. The dean ef St. Patrick, who not unfrequently sacrificed the most serious considerations to an epigram, was more moral; than generally admitted. And we more moral; than generally admitted. And we more moral; than generally admitted. And we must say that the deprayity, that characterises it must say that the depravity, that characterises it ed to, and up to the 24th there bad been no furis not of that description which allures. It is ther fighting.

Mr. and Mrs. Plumer developed those characters with felicitous correctness. Music is never more delightful than when breathing from the lips of a handsome woman—has this been said already? it matters not; had we hitherto been Poles is ascribed with apparent justice to the last, an opportunity of being convinced on hearing Mrs. Plumer. How delightfully she warbled through those soft, original, though sometimes monotonous melodies, which abound in our English compositions! How pure and velvet like the sounds which she trills forth from an ever flexible organ—an organ which only wants a little inore emulation and practice in the school of the great masters, to cope with Boldness and success, against the most arduous of musical difficulties: To those who have heard her in the Barber of Seville, overcoming the intricacies of Rosini's music, this merited tribute will not be charged with exaggeration. There the hearers. These advantages are hardly destroyed by the accompaniment of an incomplete as the event promised the spendier approach of orchestra, led with something less than mediocrity. Plunes, in Mackeath shared with his of Thursday evening have arrived; and, it will defied the jarring of sounds, which intercepted the passage of his voice from the boards to the audience; it topped the discordance, filled the house and rivetted attention. Those two artists, though lamely borne out, if we except Gray, bodied forth with advantage the various scenes of a poem as singular, as it was new to our Orleans audience, who by frequent applause evinced their satisfaction. Their performances, which had not at first been as fully attended, as could have is equal to their talent, now attract the most respectable audiences: to notice such a fact is to do corrected the precipitancy of judgment, and to justify the eulogies conferred on those, who have triumphed over headlong prejudice.

We have been favored with the subjoined extract of a letter, received by a gentleman of this city. It confirms the news brought, a few weeks ago, by the Romulus, and published in our columns.

HAVANA, April 16, Through the channel of our friend-I shall give you an account of the events, which have taken place up to the present date: I impart to you the important intelligence, which we received yesterday from the peninsula. You will find them detailed at length in the paper, which I forward by the same opportunity. In addition to it, the captain of the brig Ligero has informed us, that at the time of his setting sail from Cadiz, on the 4th of March, there was a tremend ous fring in the direction of the island of St. Fer-That the whole corps of Marine had passed over to General Torrijo (a constitutionalist,) who had entered the island at the head of 1800 men. It was believed that the skirmishing was between General Torrijo und General Quesada, who arrived from Sevilla with 600 men.

The Governor was killed by a pistol-shot in Veronica, at the corner of Carne street; no one sallied forth to defend him; every one was quiet, and the corpse lay in the same spot until night. We expect important advices by the next cour ier

It was the only paper received in his city.

Determined, however, to make their retrent in as good order as possible, thay set fire to Praga, in order to interrupt for a time the advance of the Russians. Praga was thus destroyed. On the 28th, the municipal authorities of Warsaw, finding themselves no longer protected by their brave army, and being unable, from the nature of the city, to prevent the entry of the Russians, held a meetng, at which it was resolved to surrender at discretion. They waited upon the Russian commander, to signify their submission; and the Russian troops immediately entered the capital.

The surrender of Warsaw does not necessari y imply the complete success of the Russian arms, as regards the war in Poland; but our own impression is decidedly that it would be utterly impossible for the Polish army, in the absence of a complete natural movement, which does not appear to exist, to hold out with any prospect of success; consequently, we consider the question of Polish Independence, for a time tart and sweet, 23 a 24, and a cargo of about at least, at an end. There is reason, however, to believe that the Emperor of Russia will in the hour of victory, be more generous than he was merciful in the hour of combat and that the blood of the brave Poles who have fallen may not have been shed in vain. It will be some consolation to find this hope realized, although we trust sincerely that the statesmen of this and of a neighboring country will never forget that every stride taken by Russia is an encroachment upon the principle of liberty, and that generos ity after conquest rather increases than diminish-
