Remarks on the Haves Cotton Market.

our late Havre papers we remark amongst other in noticel articles that of Cotton of the present year, in the let of April to the let of July. One of these is contains a paragraph is at leads us to induling in ctions as editors that can but be appreciated by satticle. The paragraph runs thus --

In giving this article all the attention that its impor-Ince at juirse we have sought to discover if the fall sperienced in the Havre market and which would not be less for the month of April than 7 to to 9 franks were truly the cause of the three results show mentioned, viz: 1st, A fall in the United States, 2d, A heavier crop and 3d, A scarcity of money, or whether it was not caused by one only, or by some other entirely apart from either.
We frankly admit that our ideas as to commercial matters are limited, too much so probably for us to cut the question short and give our opinion as the prevailing one. We will observe however that we treat here, only of general theories, based on what experience offers most positive evidence during a lapse o 40 to 25 years; and upon these theories we establish is argument.

It would be incorrect to think? that the fall in e article, or the scarcity of money in the United ates is the result of the difference in the flavre market. Past experience too well/eaches us that these two circumstances united sever could preduce such an alteration in the current paces of foreign markets We are well aware-notwithstanding, ther, the want of money, might sometimes have induced some American in release to order their correspondents to sell under the current prices, when heavy engagements oblige them to realize funds, with all possible despetch; but they conjuncture could never be taken as an element or decide on the value of cotton and for the establishment of fixed rates current of the artist. The of a fixed-price current of the article. The mernts of New Orleans must be too well satisfied o he truth of the principle just stated to need any fur-her remarks upon the subject, and if any better proof re necessary we would take it from transactions that have occurred in N. Ocioana for the last 15 or 20 years. During that interval we have seen numerous specuations in Cotton becoming rich or loosing considera

At that time, the commodity was bought at very fair prices in New Orleans, and sold advantageously in the European markets: at one time the prices here were exhorbitant, and produced immense longer on were exhormant, and produced immense losses on the other side of the Atlantic. Thus we may say, with every possible assurance, that our rates, or mo-mentary difficulties, with few exceptions, never could be taken as ground-work for European prices current. thow shall we account for the fall in the Havre, verpool, and other ultramarine markets? The nestion is easily selved, if attention is paid to the initial amount of the crops, and to that required for bright current consumption. The exports during the coar 1835, until August and September, were for Europe. 994,425 bales; whilst in 1836, during the same lapse of time, they amounted to 1,343,383 bales—leav-

These reasons are so palpable that any one may see mediately, that if there has been a sensible fall in but truly because of the overplus in the crop, and on account of the wants of the manufacturers being ex-ceeded by too heavy an exportation, on which the larly planters, to take proper measures to place their arricle henceforward to the most advantage. These measures might consist in the petitioning to the general Congress for the opening of new markets. This end could be obtained but by a treaty of amity with in profesence to those of any other country in the known world: Spain, once freed from the horrors civil warfare, Portugal, Italy, Greece, and even Furkey, offer us many new marts. It belongs, thereinc, to the representatives of the people to divine the future prospects of the United States, and suggest the means of giving all possible extension and pros porty to this branch of our foreign commerce. - Trans-
