The Mercantile says that we are "certainly mistaken, if we suppose that it can LEND itself, or its columns, to thwart, in an unmanly and intriguing manner, the election of general Dawson." This is not saying, however, that both it and its columns may not be bought for that purpose. But if Mr. Prieur should think either worth buying, we consist that we have underrated him. "Meanwhile it is certain that the government must soon rall together the Chambers; but many are straid that the showcation will be the signal for a serious centered between different brancher of our state authorities, which may give birth to fresh disorders and convulsions. In such a situation, it is not surprising that the public funds should decine gradually. The capitalists connot fail to be alarmed at the unalavorable chances for public credit which our funes prospocts present. Nevertheless, tranquillity continues to be preserved among the mass of the people; and it is shoped that the price of bread, which has a fiready fallen, will still be lower, which is a point of great importance to the laboring population."
