Could not this principle of bills of exchange be applied in a more general manner, and us utility be increased? Why, if found so convenient in transactions between distant marts, could not the same idea, though perhaps in another form, be applied to the interior transactions of a meat seminerial cuts?

In the insports of cases the increhant having articles for saic has at the saine time an equal or nearly recual amount of purchases to make. If meyery instance he were to find persons ready to turnish him with the articles he intends to buy with the proceeds of this goods, then simple exchanges would take place, and a whole series of complicated transactions would be dispensed with. But such a coincidence liardily ever happens. He, for instance, who has conton for sale wants manufactured corosing goods which his purchaser does not hold, though his purchaser may have on hand a stock of sugar. So that
