I was in no mood to talk to my playmates. Sparkle and Snow were chatting and laughing on our way home, but I was quiet. Head hanging, heart sinking, I found it difficult to be sociable, even to smile. The year was 1955 and I was ten years old. The autumn wind blew bitterly, tearing off the brown leaves and flinging them on the ground, each fall of leaves causing me further sadness. The dream I'd had the previous night had cast a dark shadow over me. Six months earlier, my father, together with thousands of other intellectuals in my home down Qingdao, had been taken to an isolated place, escorted by security guards, to confess the "sins" in their past. They were to tell the government in detail what they'd done for the previous government, the National Government led by Jiang Jieshi (Chang Kai-shek). Many of them were then arrested or killed either for what they'd done at that time or for what they said about the past. I missed my father terribly.
