The Birth of Search and the Slave Trade.

The debafes in the British Parliament respecting the right of search and the slave trade, full reports of which are contained in the mails by the Arabia, are replete with interest. Touching the strot of the two questiones, after a drigent and critical perusal of he discousion, we are bound to acknowledge not only that the language used was eminently mild, scotting and conciliatory, but that the leading members of the cabinet unless tatingly arowed that the position taken by our American statesmen and publicists was into-mirroreribly just: in other words, that the right of search was a belligerent right, with could not be lawfully enforced in time of peace. Every speaker, including Mr. Portice, Lord John Kr. Serie, Mr. Piessant' and Lord Palmeranto, concurred in this opinion. The principle has been firmally surrendered. The only point yet remaining to be sattled is, whether the limited States will agree to co-operate with fireal Britain in any plan which may be alto detection of attempts by Spanish or their vessels engaged in the slave trade tells research by prostuting the American Cag. This is a subject for future negotiation, but whatever may be the action of the American carement, we will venture to sasert that hereafter the will be few or no combants of the time of the subject of the words of the subject of the subject to future negotiation, but whatever may be the action of the American Cag.
