Every Sunday, probably before dinner, a family in a Kolkata home would sit around the table and marvel at the worn-out copy of Tagore's works, that the matriarch, who is no more, had brought from her village. She read them aloud and the children, who had no access to their own sets, would listen eagerly to the stories. The family used to keep the book on a shelf in the living room, where it would be seen majorly. We had come across it in a house in Kolkata which was very clean and we used to see it in the house all day long.

Wedding on TV, in captivity

Kolkata was witness to a wedding on the small screen a few days ago, when the star couple of the television world, Barun Mukherjee and Soumitro Chatterjee, exchanged vows in a private ceremony.

The ceremony was held in a plush hotel in the city and was attended by close friends and family of the couple. The wedding was a low-key affair, with only a limited number of guests in attendance.

Barun and Soumitro have been dating for a few years and the wedding was a long time coming. The couple had put a lot of effort into planning the wedding, and had even decided to have it in a low-key manner, with only close friends and family in attendance.

The couple选择了 the venue for the ceremony, which was a private room in a hotel in the city. The venue was decorated with flowers and lights, and the couple looked stunning in their wedding outfits.

The ceremony was followed by a reception, which was also held in the same hotel. The reception was a more low-key affair, with only close friends and family in attendance.

The couple 可能会 have a few more guests to invite later on, but for now they are just happy to be married. They are planning to have a small party with a few close friends later on, and are looking forward to spending the rest of their lives together.

His unique perspective

Nipun Chakraborty

At a week or so ago, a friend of mine referred to me a book by Anand Patel, an ex-UCLA student and former Microsoft employee, called "127 Hours." Patel tells the story of his own experience of being stranded in the mountains after an accident.

The book is a reflection of his own experiences and his journey towards self-reliance and self-sufficiency. It is a story of survival, of resilience, and of the power of the human spirit.

The book is a powerful reminder of the importance of preparation and planning, and the resilience of the human spirit. It is a story of survival, of learning, and of the power of the human spirit.
