TURKEY.—The Sultan, anp the people of Turkey continue to be in the same cheerful, quiet state which has characterized the interval between the conclusion of the late war, and the opening of the present one. The war, which commenced about the 1st of July, has not yet been carried on with much vigor, or in such a manner as to give any promise of a speedy conclusion. The armies of the two parties are now in the same position as when the war began, and the expectation is that the contest will be prolonged for some time longer. The Sultan has not yet sent any expedition against his enemy, the Persians, and the Persians have not yet made any serious effort to advance towards the interior of Turkey. The state of the two countries is therefore the same as it was before the war, and there is no reason to suppose that it will be changed for some time to come. The situation of the Turkish army is favorable, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The Persians, on the other hand, are not in a position to make any serious attempt to advance towards the interior of Turkey, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The state of the two countries is therefore the same as it was before the war, and there is no reason to suppose that it will be changed for some time to come. The situation of the Turkish army is favorable, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The Persians, on the other hand, are not in a position to make any serious attempt to advance towards the interior of Turkey, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The state of the two countries is therefore the same as it was before the war, and there is no reason to suppose that it will be changed for some time to come. The situation of the Turkish army is favorable, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The Persians, on the other hand, are not in a position to make any serious attempt to advance towards the interior of Turkey, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The state of the two countries is therefore the same as it was before the war, and there is no reason to suppose that it will be changed for some time to come. The situation of the Turkish army is favorable, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The Persians, on the other hand, are not in a position to make any serious attempt to advance towards the interior of Turkey, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The state of the two countries is therefore the same as it was before the war, and there is no reason to suppose that it will be changed for some time to come. The situation of the Turkish army is favorable, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The Persians, on the other hand, are not in a position to make any serious attempt to advance towards the interior of Turkey, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The state of the two countries is therefore the same as it was before the war, and there is no reason to suppose that it will be changed for some time to come. The situation of the Turkish army is favorable, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The Persians, on the other hand, are not in a position to make any serious attempt to advance towards the interior of Turkey, and the Sultan has no occasion to dread any immediate danger. The state of the two countries is therefore the same as it was before the war, and there is no reason to suppose that it will be changed for some time to come.