RICHES NEAR DEAD

AMERICANS TO OBTAIN MINERALS IN MEXICAN CATACOMBS

Bodies found during excavations in the Silver Bell mines in the upper Potosí district of the Bolivian Republic, have revealed the presence of large deposits of silver and lead, which are expected to have a value of several million dollars. The discovery was made by prospectors working in the Silver Bell mines, who found the bodies while exploring the galleries. The bodies were identified as those of miners who had been buried alive in the mines during the construction of the galleries. The bodies were found in a chamber that was over 100 feet deep, and were believed to have been buried alive by a collapse of the galleries during the excavation. The mine is owned by the Silver Bell Mining Company, which is expected to begin work on the chamber immediately. The company is expected to recover the minerals in the chamber, which are expected to have a value of several million dollars. The discovery is expected to have a significant impact on the mining industry in the region, and is expected to attract new investors to the area.
