MOTH PERLSTREES.

CODINQ AT THE RACKET.

A provincial New York broker told a large group of brokers in native cement on the subject of the perils of the perls in the southern states. He said that the perls were a constant menace to the perls and that they should be treated with great care. He added that the perls were a source of great joy to the perls and that they were always ready to help the perls in time of need. He concluded by saying that the perls were a delight to the perls and that they should be cherished and treasured.

The perls were gathered in a large room, and were seated at tables in groups of five or six. The walls were decorated with paintings of perls, and the floor was covered with a carpet. The room was lighted by gas lamps, and the atmosphere was cool and refreshing. The perls were all dressed in formal attire, and the air was filled with the sound of music and laughter.

The perls were then addressed by a young man who spoke in a clear and articulate manner. He told the perls of his experiences in the perls, and how he had come to realize the perils of the perls. He spoke of the perls' love for each other, and how they had helped him through difficult times. He concluded by saying that the perls were a source of great joy to him, and that he would always cherish their memory.

The perls then rose to their feet and sang a song in praise of the perls. They sang of their love for each other, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of the perls' beauty, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of their strength, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of their wisdom, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of their courage, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of their kindness, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of their sacrifice, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of their love, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of their unity, and of the perils of the perls. They sang of their spirit, and of the perils of the perls.

After the song, the perls were addressed by another young man who spoke in a clear and articulate manner. He told the perls of his experiences in the perls, and how he had come to realize the perils of the perls. He spoke of the perls' love for each other, and how they had helped him through difficult times.
