THE QUESTION OF FOOD

Both President Wilson and his allies were at the defense of the right of congress in passing laws giving extraordinary powers to the executive in the case of a food emergency. The food administrator, though from time to time he has given way to the pressure of the situation from the allies, is determined to resist the demands that the allies would have the right to control the food supply of the United States.

The London Daily Mail, commenting on the situation, says: "The whole situation is a matter of the utmost importance, and the House of Commons is not likely to be swayed by the arguments of the allies in favor of the control of the food supply. The permanent control of the food supply by Great Britain has been agreed upon, and it is not likely that the House of Commons will consent to it. The House of Commons will not consent to the control of the food supply of the United States by Great Britain."

J. M. B. Baker, a member of the House of Commons, said: "The House of Commons would not consent to the control of the food supply of the United States by Great Britain. The House of Commons has agreed upon the permanent control of the food supply by Great Britain. The House of Commons will not consent to the control of the food supply of the United States by Great Britain."

The House of Commons has agreed upon the permanent control of the food supply by Great Britain. The House of Commons will not consent to the control of the food supply of the United States by Great Britain.

The resolution has been passed by the House of Commons. The House of Commons has agreed upon the permanent control of the food supply by Great Britain. The House of Commons will not consent to the control of the food supply of the United States by Great Britain.

The resolution has been passed by the House of Commons. The House of Commons has agreed upon the permanent control of the food supply by Great Britain. The House of Commons will not consent to the control of the food supply of the United States by Great Britain.