LATER FROM MEXICO.

The Triumph confirmed—Victories of Contreras and Churubusco—Immense loss of the Enemy—Gen. Scott near the Capital—Armistice between the two Armies—Negotiations for Peace.

At an early hour yesterday morning, the Steamship Mary Kingsland, Captain DAVIS, arrived in our port, bringing full accounts of the interesting and important intelligence of which we had previously received an outline by the Fashion. The forces under Gen. Scott had encountered vastly more numerous bodies of Mexicans, protected by strong fortifications, had dislodged and dispersed them in two separate engagements, killing and wounding an immense number, and capturing many prisoners, and an enormous quantity of artillery and ammunition. These glorious achievements were nevertheless purchased at a heavy price. A large proportion of our best and bravest officers, and over one thousand of the rank and file were killed or wounded. The loss of the enemy is not completely ascertained, but from an inspection of the battle fields and from the extraordinary number of dead Mexicans found there it is believed that in killed alone, their loss far exceeds our entire list of killed, wounded and missing. The forces of the Americans actually engaged in the two battles were not more than 7,000—those of the Mexicans are variously estimated at from 20,000 to 32,000 men. We make up the subjoined particulars from information which has reached, and from the accounts furnished by our cotemporaries.

On the 15th ult., the division under Gen. Worth, followed by the forces under Generals Pillow, Quitman and Twiggs moved on in the direction of San Augustin, thus completely turning the strong works of the Penon and Mexicaltzingo, which has been carefully fortified by Santa Anna. The next day, Gen. Worth reached the hacienda of San Gregorio, at slight skirmish having occurred, between General Twiggs's division and a large body of the enemy. On the 17th, the march was resumed until Santa Cruz was reached—a small village lying South-East of the Capital, about 9 miles distant. Some skirmishing took place, and the pickets of the enemy were driven in by our advance guard. The American troops arrived near San Augustine.

On the morning of the 18th, Gen. Scott arrived, and at ten, the troops were in full march for the city of Mexico. A reconnoitring party was sent out to examine the fortifications of San Antonio where the enemy was known to be in force. In performing this duty, Captain Thornton, of the 2nd Dragoons, was killed by a cannon ball. In the meantime, a road was discovered leading to the village of San Angel, by occupying which the strong hold of the enemy at San Antonio might be turned. The Mexicans were in great force at a commanding position near Coutreras, and it was determined to attack them the next day.

On the morning of the 19th, the divisions of Gen. Pillow and Twiggs were ordered to advance in the direction of Coutreras, and by one in the afternoon were in plain sight of the enemy's batteries, and within range of his heavier guns. The brigade of Gen. P. F. Smith was ordered to advance directly towards the enemy's works, while that of Col. Riley moved towards a small village to the right, with orders to gain the main road and thus be enabled to cut off any reinforcements which might be sent to Valencia from the city. An incessant firing of cannon was opened upon the advance of General Smith, and soon the rifles were engaged in skirmishing with the pickets of the enemy and driving them in. The 12-pounder battery of Capt. Magruder was pressed forward with all speed, as was also the rocket and mountain howitzer battery, now commanded by Lieut Callender, of the Ordnance Department. As soon as they could gain a position they opened upon the enemy, but were so much exposed to a fire from heavier guns that they were soon silenced. Lt. Johnson, of the 1st Artillery, but attached to Magruder's battery, was mortally wounded, while Lieut. Callender was severely wounded in both legs. At 3 o'clock the brigade of Gen. Cadwalader was ordered out to support Col. Riley, heavy reinforcements being seen on their way out to join the city, while Gen. Pierce's brigade was sent to sustain Gen. Smith. At this time Gen Scott appeared on the ground, with Gen. Shields' brigade of volunteers, which was immediately ordered to the support of General Cadwalader. The action continued with great sharpness until night had fairly closed in, the firing from the batteries being incessant and continuing for six hours. A heavy rain fell in the evening, completely drenching the troops, who were compelled to bivouac, without blankets, in the midst of the pitiless showers,—wet, weary, chilled and hungry. Nevertheless, the next morning they rose with alacrity and prepared for new tests of heroism and valor. What followed is succinctly and vigorously narrated by the Delta:

"But now," says our correspondent, "imagine the position of this portion of the army, numbering 3500, at the outside, without artillery or cavalry, while the enemy in front and on the left had 19,000 troops, (those in the fort said to be the best in Mexico) with 22 pieces of artillery, and among his troops about 7000 cavalry. It was evident that some decisive action had to be taken; that some great effort had to be made; and Gen. Smith and Col. Riley, seconded as they were by men just as competent to the task, and no attack on the main work was contemplated upon, and the movement to take place at 3 o'clock of the following morning."

The force of General Smith was not strong enough for the enemy's works, and at the same time to hold possession of the village: but leaving in the charge of the baggage: but leaving in the charge of the baggage: but leaving in the charge of the baggage
