PEST CARRIER FLEET STRENGTHENS FROM WICHITA

POINDEXTER MEMBERS TO DO THEIR DUTY

A "pest carrier" is what the police and health officials in Wichita call it. The Potawatomi Indians, who have long been known as a carrier of disease in the area, are now under close watch.

In addition to the Potawatomi, a number of other species have been identified as potential carriers of disease. These include the brown mouse, the black rat, and the white-footed mouse.

The situation is especially critical in the Wichita area, where there is a high concentration of the Potawatomi population. The police and health officials are working closely with the community to ensure that these carriers are controlled and contained.

New York Will Witness an October 9th

Great Fleet Assembly in the Nation's Capital

Washington, D.C.: The great fleet of the nation's capital will gather on October 9th for a special assembly. The ships, which form the backbone of the nation's defense, will be displayed in all their glory.

The assembly will be held on the Potomac River, with the warships anchored in a line from north to south. A special ceremony will be held to honor the crews of the ships and to celebrate the nation's defense.

WATER PORTERS OF QUITO

They Carry Big Barrels On Their Heads

A group of water porters in Quito, Ecuador, has been causing a stir in the city. These men carry large barrels on their heads as they make their way through the streets.

The barrels are filled with water and are used to transport water to the city's homes. The men carry them on their heads to make the work easier and quicker.

INDIAN NAME FOR WHISKEY

Called "Water Wine" Because of Its Appearance

When the Quichua Indians of Ecuador first encountered whiskey, they called it "water wine" because of its appearance.

This was due to the fact that whiskey is a clear liquid, while wine is usually more opaque. The Indians were impressed by the liquid's clarity and called it "water wine."
