Torpado in Washington.

We learn from the Saturday issue of the "Washington Post," that about 9 o'clock on Saturday last, about a dozen of the most violent guerillas in the city, in a party of 15 or 20 persons, all highly armed and mounted, proceeded to the residence of the King of Spain, in the suburbs of the city, taking the King by surprise, and burned the palace. The King, however, was not at home, but was on a visit to the southern part of the country. The guerillas proceeded to the palace, turned the garrison out, and set fire to the palace, which was in a state of great confusion, and the guerillas fired upon the garrison from the windows, and the inhabitants of the city, who were greatly alarmed, came out to assist in putting out the fire. The guerillas were driven off by the garrison, and the palace was saved. The King was much astonished at the attempt, and ordered a full investigation to be made of the facts.
